Auto Collision Gets Man In Local Court

M. B. Erlinger of McClellandtown, was before Burgess Dunlap this morning charged with operating a car while under the influence of drink. He was arrested at the instigation of E. M. Moyer. Mr. Moyer appeared at the hearing to testify.

It appears that yesterday afternoon at the intersection of Schoonmaker avenue and Ninth street, the Erlinger and Moyer cars collided and the Moyer car was somewhat damaged. Mr. Moyer had asked Erlinger to make settlement for the damage done and he replied that if settled it would be before the squire. Mr. Moyer then brought the charge against the man.

At the hearing Mr. Erlinger testified that he was coming along Schoonmaker avenue at a moderate rate of speed and the Moyer car was in front of him and that when he blew his horn, the car pulled to the right and he thought it was making way for him to pass, but instead it pulled in front in order to turn down Ninth street. The machines came together and a fender on the Moyer car was damaged. The machine was being driven by Vira Moyer and according to two officers who were eye witnesses, neither machine was being driven at an excessive rate of speed. Mr. Erlinger maintained that the accident was unavoidable and that neither driver could avoid the collision.

Officer Stull testified that when he arrested Erlinger he was under the influence of drink, but that he was not driving the car, but was trying to start it.

In concluding the case, the burgess remarked that he believed the charge was just, the evidence true, and that the man was guilty, but that owing to the extreme penalty that would have to be imposed, and considering the light damage done, he would discharge the defendant. The fine for driving a machine while under the influence of drink is $100 and costs. Erlinger then agreed to pay Mr. Moyer for the damage done.

William Young giving his home as Pricedale was arrested this morning charged with chicken stealing. It seems the man had in his possession half a dozen chickens that answered the description of some that were stolen. Meat shops were notified to be on the lookout for a chicken salesman and when Young stepped into Konopinski's market, suspicion was aroused and the man arrested. He denies the charge and says he brought the chickens from his home and that they belong to him.

CHICKEN CAUSE OF BIG FIRE

The frame residence of Mrs. Minnie Polk on Shady avenue between Seventh and Eighth streets, in Charleroi, was totally destroyed by fire at eight o'clock this morning, and the house adjoining, the property of Thomas Reed, was badly damaged.

Mrs. Polk has a number of pet chickens which she had placed in the kitchen while she went down street shopping. During her absence, one of the chickens flew on the stove and the feathers caught fire. The chicken badly frightened rushed about the room setting it on fire and despite the efforts of the fire department, the building was a mass of ruins within an hour after the flames were discovered.

In carrying goods from the burning building, Mrs. Polk was badly burned by the flames and the chicken which caused the conflagration along with the other fowls that were in the room was cremated.

OFFICER MENEFEE RESIGNS

Fred Menefee, who for the past two years has served faithfully and efficiently on the police force, has tendered his resignation to Burgess A. G. Dunlap to take effect at the expiration of ten days.

The action on the part of Officer Menefee while a surprise to the burgess, comes after considerable deliberation and a final decision to give up police duty. The resignation will be accepted and Mr. Menefee will receive an honorable discharge, and the well wishes of the chief executive, the council and his fellow officers.

That Mr. Menefee has made a good officer, putting forth his best efforts to serve the public in a creditable manner, no one in touch with police affairs will deny. During his term of service, he answered every call, was courteous and obliging to the press and the public and was fearless in the discharge of his duties, and whereever he was called he went fearlessly and with a determination that the majesty of the law should be upheld. In his official duties or his private life, he did not commit an act that brought litigation upon the borough or reflection upon those who placed him in office.

Mr. Menefee, it is understood has accepted a position in the Pittsburgh Steel and at the expiration of his ten days' notice to the borough he will surrender his equipment and enter upon a new field of labor.

Good Speaker Secured For Fourth of July

The committee in charge of the Fourth of July celebration in this city are working in earnest to make the affair a success, although it will not be on as large a scale as former years. New attractions are being added daily to keep the people interested and there will be something doing from early in the morning until late at night.

Attorney Charles A. Whitten of Greensburg, has been secured as the principal orator of the day and he will deliver a patriotic address from the band stand in Sixth street park immediately after the parade in the morning.

A big feature of the parade will be the Boy Scouts in their new uniforms and it has also been announced that a number of foreign societies have signified their intentions of marching in uniform on that occasion. The parade will be headed by a brass band which will give a short concert at the park.

In the afternoon Manager Lee Vaughn of the local Independents has announced that he will stage a ball game between his aggregation and the Independent ball team of Charleroi. This game will probably be followed by the annual contest between the Sunnyside and Shadyside teams of Donner avenue. Former stars of the town will appear in the lineup of the two teams.

In the evening a band concert will be given at the Sixth street park and the festivities will be brought to a close with a magnificient display of fireworks.

Westinghouse Here Next Saturday

The Independent base ball team will have as their opponents Saturday afternoon, the fast Westinghouse Athletic association of East Pittsburgh. This is the team that now holds the championship of the Greater Pittsburgh district and they have not met defeat this season. Acting Secretary Lindsay stated that he would have his strongest lineup here Saturday and does not think the locals will break their winning streak.

The Independents will be strengthened by the addition of several new players. Krepps, Hogg, Ryan and Underwood will be available as twirlers with Guder or Underwood on the receiving end. On the fifth of July the Independents will travel to Charleroi to play the strong independent team of that town a game in the morning, and in the afternoon, the same teams will be the attraction at Page park.

Local Young Man Acts As Toastmaster

The Douglas Business College Alumni banquet was held last night in the Monier hotel, Charleroi. The list contained three Monessen people, namely Miss Thelma Kennedy, Charles Williams and Hugh Smyth, the latter being class president and toastmaster of the evening.

As head of the affair Mr. Smyth equipped himself admirable. The banquet was a sumptuous affair and was enjoyed by every person present. It consisted of half a dozen courses, and the service was up to the high standard of this popular hostelry.

After the banquet hour a very excellent and enjoyable program was rendered. It consisted of music, speeches, responses and toasts. Miss Kennedy a graduate of the 1915 class, gave the response to the address of welcome. The evening will ever be remembered as a memorable one for the students of the Douglas college.

The Mind at Ease

Since the sinking of the Lusitania, Uncle Sam has been a very sick patient. Now the fever—war fever—consuming him has been allayed by the skillful treatment of an able physician; the crisis is past unless a relapse be caused by some unforseen complication.

We, the people, are the United States—the patient. Let's get the fever out of our blood, for once and all. It's a virulent disease, this intermittent war fever. It ravishes the body it makes inroads on the soul of a nation. Until we throw off its grip we cannot fully perform our normal functions. We cannot make our fertile fields fully return their rich harvest, we cannot seek our own marts of trade, nor cause the wheels of our geat factories to sing their songs of prosperity, for we are not physically, morally or mentally fit to do so, in full measure, while the slightest trace of the insidious disease lingers.

Contentment and happiness surrounds us here in blessed America, even while the old world writhes in an agony, such as history has never before recounted.

The mad, unholy war has shed its baneful poison to all points of the globe, even to us. By a narrow margin we have escaped fatal contagion, thrown off the spell. Our blood is cooling, our pulse is throbbing less violently, our mind is clearing, the malady is passing rapidly.

In our convalescence we must use care, think peace abjure war, turn our efforts to setting all the machinery of commerce in full swing once more, as if there were not or had never been world war.

Let's help our suffering, starving neighbors in Mexico to new life by giving of our bounteous abundance freely and without stint. By aiding them to solve their problems in the best way they may, so that once more—soon—all this continent may dwell in peace and happy security.

It would be fine, wouldn't it?

Hard on the Laundry

A few years ago a man who wore a shirt that rolled open at the neck was at once put down as one who painted pictures, or had shocking ideas about marriage, or made speeches on the class struggle.

But this summer, look. There's the banker, real estate man, college student, clerk and young and old men of all vocations with this as a part of their wearing apparel. You will notice that their collars are in one piece with the shirt roll back at a point an inch or more down the breast leaving the neck free. The open throat, it had been claimed by philosophers, is a cause as well as a result of freedom in body, mind and soul. Does its fashionableness this summer, mean less conventionality, more naturalness and simplicity?

At any rate, if there are no collar buttons to be lost it means more quiet in the home. If there are no collars, stiff or soft, to choke, it means more comfort abroad. The econmical man will also be surprised to learn that his laundry bills have also greatly diminished.

GREAT GRANDSON OF KING GEORGE IV IS NEWARK JANITOR

Newark, N. J., June 23—A humble janitor in Newark city hall, James C. Fitzherbert has produced documentary evidence that he is the great grandson of King George IV of England. Garbed in overalls and jumper, with a time clock to check his going and coming, he works daily with broom, mop and dust pan, awaiting the day when he can claim his rights.

The claim of Fitzherbert is based on family records and on documents that have lain buried concerning the agreement between King George IV, Princess Alexandrina, later Queen Victoria, and her line of successors, by which the offspring of the morganatic marriage of George IV was to leave England and refrain from going to London or any part of Western Europe until the year 1912. This remarkable agreement was signed May 17, 1832, and bears the signatures of King William, Queen Victoria, Maria Ann Fitzherbert, the morganatic wife and her son, James H. A. Hayward. It was witnessed by Charles Grey, Earl of Hanover, Henry Brougham, chancellor, Arthur Wellesley, Lord Wellington and Rev. Sidney Smith. The document bears the royal seal.

As a part of the pact, six thousand pounds, $30,000 was to be paid annually during the natural lifetimes of the deported family, and to deposit in the Bank of England a million pounds, or $5,000,000 or rather, an amount that would reach the five million mark in the year 1912.

It also provided in the solemn document that in case the succession should not result in an heir to the throne and Parliament, should recall the line of George IV, then, and not otherwise, would the fund be cancelied.

By a peerabe patent also issued at that time, the Fitzherbert heir was given the right to the title of the Duke of Malta, after the year 1912, or to receive instead a grant of $250,000.

The Fitzherbert claim adds another chapter to a long controversy, one of the great mysteries of English history, as to whether there were children born to George IV and Maria Ann Fitzherbert, whom he made his morganatic wife in 1785. This remarkable woman was born Mary Ann Smythe. She married at 19 Edward Weld of Lulworth Castle in the county of Dorset. He died early and she marnerton. He died after three years. The young widow was known as the "beautiful Mrs. Fitzherbert," and it wa snot long after she lost her second husband that she met the Prince of Wales, afterward George IV. He was 23 and she 29. History records that he paid ardent court to the fair widow. It was when the Prince was injured and she had gone with the Duchess of Devonshire to his bedside, that the proposal of marriage was made. Finally on December 21, 1785, they were wed by an Anglican clergyman. The marriage was invalid because it was contracted without the consent of George III. The couple lived happily together for ten years. Then the king married Princess Caroline, who afterwards became a royal exile, and by consent of the Pope, Mrs. Fitzherbert and the king renewed their relations in 1803. The king died in 1830 and his morganatic wife in 1837.

Beforeh sideath, King George tried in vain to get possession of numerous documents held by his morganatic wife. His successor, William IV appears eto have accomplished by kindness what George trid to do by force. All but five of the papers relating to her life with King George.

According to the present claims of the Fitzherberts, a son was born to the King and Mrs. Fitzherbert in 1786. This son is said to have lived in Ireland, where he married and had three choldren, two sons and a daughter, and it is from these two sons that the branches of the family in this country trace their lineage. J. Theus Fitzherbert of Shunk, Sullivan county, Pa., is lcaimed to be the present head of the family here. It was he who discovered the long-lost documents relating to the family lot, and had lain there for over a half century.

One of the choicest bits of evidence which the family holds is tshe letters of Queen Victiria, written in 1884, which states that she is sending a decoration as insignia of rank to be worn after the year 1912.

Not until the great European war is over can the heirs hope to come into possession of the $5,000,000 placed to their credit in the Bank of England, nor can the legality of the cdaims be established.

SIXTH STORY

I

Ray Norris' law office faced Willard Fall's engineering office directly across the court of the same skyscraper in the city. The two young men had become acquainted through their business proximity, invitations had been extended, calls exchanged, and the two families were in a fair way of becoming friends

Ray Norris was a prosperous young attorney, clean cut, handsome, ambitious, and tenderly devoted to his wife If her husband was tenderly devoted to her, she was infinitely devoted to him.

Mrs. Fall on the other hand was thirty-five; engrossed in her social duties, a self-imposed social monitor and guardian of the morals of her set, who was too busy with her many tasks to grow old gracefully. Her husband, well-groomed, suave and careless, was known as a lady's man, and already disquieting rumors were reaching his wife. On the morning on which our story opens, Mrs Fall had seen him through the window, talking to a pretty society bud, and had sent the maid to call him back. There had been a scene and he had left for his office in a huff

II

"'Lo Miss Foster. How're you this fine morning? I hope your father is better?" It was Norris talking to his stenographer.

"Good morning, Mr. Norris He's some better, thank you." She was trying to be brave, and answered with an attempt at cheerfulness that set her head pounding violently, and made her grasp at her desk for support. He had thrown off his light top coat, and without looking at her sat down, and was in a moment deep in his morning's mail. Some communication of more than ordinary importance caused him to stop in his envelope slitting, and he rose to confer with her upon its contents. Then for the first time he looked at her, and knew from her flushed cheeks and unnaturally bright eyes that something was wrong.

"Why, Miss Foster!" he exclaimed in genuine concern, "whatever's the trouble? You look like the very dickens. What's up?"

"Oh, nothing," she answered, trying to make light of his concern—"leastwise, nothing that matters. Just a bothersome cold, and a little headache. By the way, is that that Smith & Hodson letter? What's the latest development this morning? What did they say to your proposal to—"

"Never mind that for a moment. Don't please try to turn the conversation off into that channel. You're ill."

"I assure you, Mr——' He made a quick gesture indicative of his intention not to be put off in his inquiry, and crossing quickly to where she stood, took her pale, thin hands in both of his, and noted with quick concern that they were burning.

"This will never do," he said gravely, and with emphatic earnestness. And he repeated half aloud, half to himself, "never, never do. I'm afraid I've been a bit of a brute lately, what with the night work, Sundays, skimped lunch hours." He disregarded her attempt to assuage his self-reproach, and went on, "But I'll see to that You're slated for a vacation, and that in short order. I'll make arrangements." He turned thoughtfully away, and went back to his letters.

Willard Fall, across the court in his office, had seen Norris cross to where Myra stood at her desk beside the broad window, and an evil smile lighted his coarse features as he noted Norris take Myra's hands in his and hold them the while he spoke solicitously to her. Devoid of concern for the welfare of his own help, he had not the finesse to attribute another's concern to anything other than a personal motive and he felt a miserable elation at what he considered "Norris' little game.' His reflections were disturbed by the slight, recurrent creaking of his door as of someone trying cautiously, inch by inch, to open it unnoticed. He sprang from his chair, strode with swift soft steps to the door, pulled it suddenly open, and confronted—his wife.

He bowed with mock courtesy at her startled surprise at being apprehended, and spoke with more than his usual unction.

"So, my dear, spying on me, eh? Had I divined your coming, I might have made preparations so's not to disappoint your expectations."

She turned, and had started to go, when his voice again arrested her.

"Your idol seems to have clay feet. You indulge in the common fallacy of imagining that every man you have no intimate acquaintance with is a model of propriety No one who is acquainted with your reputation as the watchdog of society"—here he grinned—"would ever believe you to be so frightfully unsophisticated. Why it was only a short while ago, when glancing casually out of this window and across the court, I saw Norris holding hands with his pretty stenographer."

Mrs. Fall recovered quickly from an involuntary expression of surprise, and casting a scornful, contemptuous glance at the man who justified his indulgences by calumniating another, turned and was gone

Blindly, angrily, Mrs. Fall rushed from the building, and in Central Park, where she went for rest and air, she met Mrs. Norris Forgetting that she lived "in a glass house," forgetting everything except that "misery loves company," she warned her against the pretty stenographer in her husband's office By a few careless words the seeds of an awful suspicion were sown.

III.

"All through, Miss Foster?"

"Yes,' wearily, "all through."

"Has that vicious headache left you?"

'No, it's still with me," she replied with the ghost of a smile. "It's been such a constant comrade, lately, I don't wonder but I would miss it were it to leave."

"That's a shocking state of affairs, certainly Tell me, does your father seem too great a care, lately? Do you find it difficult to give your work your best attention, with the worry of his ailing health on your mind? You know," — whimsically — "you're too great a necessity here for me to allow anything to distract you from your work.'

Her face, flushed with fever as it was, beamed softly as he mentioned her father, and connected that word with "too great a care." Her father too great a care.

"Father a care?" she answered half interrogatively. "You don't know father, Mr Norris. He is the one joy of my life. For years before I was old enough or able to work, he was father and mother to me Up with the sun each morning, he saw to it that my clothes were brushed, my pencils sharpened for school—made a warm fire and prepared my breakfast. Then, off to the frightful bleach factory where he got his cough, and at work all day, and sometimes part of the night, that I might have a pretty hair-ribbon, or a pair of new slippers. All my youthful hopes, desires, troubles were poured into his willing ears at night, and he was ever sympathetic with the extravagant fancies of my flighty, childish imagination, and always gentle in his reproaches for my many faults. No, father's no care to me It gives me pleasure each morning that I have strength to go out to work,—that I am responsible for his comfort,—and it lightens my weariness each night that I may go home and try to anticipate his every unspoken wish."

IV.

"You love me, Ray?"

Mrs. Norris asked the question of her husband. He had come home, his step light, his face expectant. He met a cold and unresponsive wife.

Norris Met a Cold and Unresponsive Wife.

The seed of suspicion planted by Mrs Fall had taken root on fertile soil. And so she asked the question.

"Love you"—why what a question' I passionately adore you. You are the guiding spirit, the holiest inspiration of my life! Without you all the rest is a meaningless jumble But,"—and here his voice took on a tone of bewilderment—"I didn't think you needed assurances'"

It was now tenfold difficult for her to go on; but she felt that this was no time to falter.

"Would you do anything, sacrifice anything in the whole world for me?"

"Anything. Everything."

"Then send that girl away from your office—and get another one."

"Send that girl away! You mean Miss Foster?"

"Yes.'

"But why?—this is absurd! Why send Myra Foster away?"

Because I wish it."

"But you must have some reason. This can't be mere imperative arbitrariness. You are not like that. Can't you tell me why? Myra Foster is my most able assistant. To send her away would be to disable me in my most important work. Besides, it would be unjust. She is a very worthy girl. She is the sole support of her aged father."

He felt the urgent sincerity of her request, and knew how deeply she was moved. But her concern was so obviously unfounded on fact that he could not help but believe it was an hysterical outbreak that would be dispelled when her overwrought nerves were quieted, and reason returned It would be ridiculous, wrong, to sacrifice Myra to this hysteria, so he decided to be firm, and make no rash promise. He spoke:

"Some old gossip has evidently been busy. We'll talk more of this when your nerves are quieter."

"No, we will talk of it now. Will you?"

"No."

She turned despairing-eyed and limp, and walked dazedly from the room.

V

The next morning Ethel kept to her room. Ray left for his office, the usual spring gone from his gait, his face grave with the anxiety of the previous evening. He arrived in the city, and proceeded immediately to his work Myra Foster was there, and her enervated movements as she went about her work showed only too plainly that her "bothersome cold and slight headache" had not improved overnight He decided quickly upon his course with regard to Myra's case, and spoke to her:

"Miss Foster, you are ill. You're in no condition for work at the present time in this or any office, and I'm going to send you and your father away I have a place down on the ocean, where you can get a breath of fresh salt air, and win back some of your old time strength and snap. So make ready, please. We can start just as soon as you can get your things together."

"Very well, Mr. Norris, and thank you. I—er—'thank you'—any words seem so inadequate, so inexpressive in acknowledgment of such kindness I'm afraid"—her voice grew soft and tender—"you'll have to take my thanks for granted."

"Forget it," he said, inelegantly, and turned to get his coat.

"Ha, ha!—Oh my!" He looked quickly over his shoulder at the sound of her mirth "Gracious!" she said half sadly, half amusedly, "we forgot the most important thing. It can't be done! How about old man Convention, his wife Scandal, and their daughter Gossip? What will people say?"

"Oh, that's all right—don't let that concern you Your father will be there, and I'll tell my wife tonight.

Together they left the office climbed into his machine, picked up her father, and in less than three hours were 'down in his place by the ocean.

Ethel Norris came down from her room after her husband left, and her usually gay face was grave, and her eyes red and heavy. She ate no breakfast, and the servants had to speak to her many times over before she could comprehend their meaning She dressed for the street about noon, and without, as usual, leaving word of her intended destination, left the house She had spent a night of very hell, her spirit tortured almost beyond endurance at the thought of another coming between her and what was dearer to her than life. She would see. She would go to his office, and let her quick woman's intuition scent out the truth for her.

She reached his office and was about to go in when a cunning thought came to her. Why let them be aware of her presence? Why give them an opportunity to be on their guard? She turned back, her "cleverness" for the moment obsessing her, and making her fearless, clean face ugly with the blight of subtlety. She would go to Fall's office, make some slight pretext for her visit, and watch them from there. She knocked softly, and, getting no answer, pushed further open the slightly ajar door, and looked in. No one there He must have stepped out for just a moment, or his door would be locked. So much the better. A moment would be enough, would, without her having to conceal that she was watching, be worth many minutes with his attention upon her The window was open, and she went to it, keeping always in the shadow of the wall, so that she could see without being seen.

Mrs. Norris saw her husband's office was empty. What could it mean? She made bolder, stepped to the center of the aperture, and bent far out to peer into the office opposite. The sheer depth of the long shaft fascinated her and gave her a light hollow feeling of nausea She drew in her head with a sharp jerk, and staggered back, her giddiness overcoming her She would have fallen but for a strong arm around her waist. It was Willard Fall.

She turned her head toward him half smiling, half apologetic, to thank him for his timely aid. But the words froze on her lips, her heart contracted her entire body was convulsed with a shudder and an appalling fear was in her eyes.

In the doorway stood Mrs. Fall.

Fate was now taking a hand, and the certain destiny started on its way by an evil-tongued man and a suspicious-minded woman, was hurrying the pawns to a swift destruction. Mrs. Norris went to her mother, who calmed her fears and sent her to her home again, after a good night's sleep. Mrs. Fall applied for a divorce and then went to the seashore and sought her cottage on the beach—the same beach on which the Norris cottage stood.

Mrs. Fall arrived at the beach in time to enjoy the sea air for half an hour before dinner, and relaxed in her comfortable beach-chair alongside another occupied by a Mrs. Hunter. Mrs Hunter, like Mrs. Fall, was one of the old guard of society, and the range of her "observation" was astonishing. Other people's affairs were as the breath of life to her, and she took it, in effect, as a personal affront if society did not constantly furnish her keen scent with a fresh track. Just now she fairly fluttered with pleasure as might a hungry sparrow who has unexpectedly come upon some delectable morsel.

Mrs. Norris, Torn by Doubt and Fear, Dresses to Follow Her Husband.

'Nice place the Norrises have, don't you think?"

"Quite nice." Mrs Fall didn't care at that moment to think of the Norrises.

"By the way did you pass there on your way down?" There was that in her voice that bespoke something more than her words could be literally held to account for. Mrs. Fall perked up.

'No, I came down by train—why?"

"Oh, nothing Only I thought you might know who that young woman is he brought down in his machine this afternoon—slim, brown eyes, black hair.'

"Alone?"—eagerly.

'No"—with a combined hand wave and shoulder shrug, as though that didn't alter it any, ' she was with what looked like a delightful useless chaperon—some superannuated incompetent "

'SssssOOOoooooo Tell me, has his wife been down lately?"

"No, she dislikes the salt air, you know. Says it reddens her complexion, or something like that, and prefers to live inland further She never comes down.'

"MMMMMMMmmmmm" Mrs. Fall said no more then to her companion, but as she rose and started to move leisurely off, Mrs. Hunter's finely attuned ears received an impression of sound, that, after diligent assembling and reassembling in her busy mind, she was gratified to resolve into something that sounded very promisingly like birds of a feather.'

Mrs. Hunter was on the scent.

She called on Ethel in her country place and was received with the courtesy her 'position" made necessary.

"Good morning, Mrs. Norris."

"Good morning, Mrs Hunter; this is an unexpected pleasure"

"Well, you don't come to see us—Mahomet and the mountain, don't you know."

"That's very kind of you Won't you sit down?"

'Thanks I can't stay very long. Informal morning musicale at the Ormsbys—how I detest them'—not the Ormsbys, of course but I'm promised for eleven Come down and see us, won't you? We have some delightful times, and you can bring your young friend along."

"Pardon me?"

"I say we have some perfectly charming times—and you can bring your young friend along'

"My young friend'"—in a tone of bewilderment.

"Yes, the girl at your cottage, you know. Came down with your husband yesterday—lovely young thing!—the girl, of course. Such eyes, and such lovely black hair

Yes, yes, to be sure —quickly, and trying to cover the very evident fact that she knew nothing at all about it "I will shortly So good of you to ask."

"I'm afraid I must be going now—oh, Heavens!" (looking at her watch). 'Mrs Ormsby will never forgive me' Good by, dear"

'Good by Mrs Hunter, sorry you can't stay"

Ethel sat there, mute and wondering, trying, struggling to grasp the meaning of it all, and vaguely dreading as she struggled to arrive at an explanation all too plausible that would sustain and re-enforce her horrible suspicions of yesterday.

The fear that she herself would be placed in a questionable position in the eyes of her husband had outweighed her fears for his fidelity to her Her trip to her mother, and her mother's reproach for her lack of faith had resolved her to tell all and stake her future happiness on his belief in her in the face of obviously incriminating circumstances Now that she had whipped her cowering courage to a desperate, brave stand, and had made ready to stand or fall on the strength of his love for her—now came this filthy gossipy scandalmonger with a tale which, if it were true—and it was only too plausible—would reawaken in her her initial doubt of his fidelity, strengthened and indorsed a hundred fold.

VI.

In awakening that morning, Norris was again visited with his dread of the previous day, that Ethel should hear of Myra's installment in his cottage before he had an opportunity to tell her. This troubled him so, that he ate no breakfast, but hurried to his office, trusting the exactions of his business to take his mind from the annoying thought. He had a violent headache by eleven o'clock, and attributing it to the fact that he had neglected his breakfast, went to an early lunch That was why, when Ethel called him at 11.30, he was out. His lunch gave him immediate relief,

He bought an "extra" from a newsboy, folded it carelessly under his arm, and ascended to his office As he threw the sheet on his desk it fell face upward, and the words "Attorney's Wife Is Co respondent in Divorce Suit," staring at him in big black type stretched clear across the page Maybe it was someone he knew He took the sheet up and carefully read the sub-headings: "Mrs. Willard Fall ('Fall!' he gasped) charges she found Mrs Ray Norris and Mr Fall embracing—"

The sheet fell from his nerveless fingers and he swallowed hard a few times to moisten his throat and mouth, which had become suddenly dry Then came a reaction from his nerveless unrealization, he felt a weak shaking throughout this whole body, and was conscious of his heart pulsing in great, uneven jumps The monstrousness, the bold assurance of that staring type was incredible It was hideous, foul. His wife and Fall! Why, they hardly knew one another!

The one event that distinguished the last few days from a year of happy, uneventful marriage was Ethel's insistent, hysterical demand to send Myra Foster away from his office. In explanation she had expressed an unwilling doubt (a doubt nevertheless) that his relations with the girl were all that they should be He knew his relations with Myra Foster were simple honest, businesslike, and that thought, combined with his wife's suspicion, suggested to him insidiously, but certainly, that her suspicion of him might be but a blind for her relations with Fall Good God, what a hideous thought! He picked up his phone receiver, clicked the hook nervously many times, and after what seemed an unusual wait was connected with his home

"Hello, Mrs Norris, please This is Mr. Norris."

"Mrs. Norris is not in, sir. She left full an hour and a half ago, and left word she had gone to the beach cottage Yes. Good-by"

She had gone to the beach!—a place he could never prevail on her to visit! Why? Had she heard of Myra Foster being there? He knew gossip could travel as fast, and faster, than that But, if she were using his relations with Myra Foster as a blind to cover her own affairs (this damnable thought kept persisting), if she were, was it possible that she would have the temerity to seize on Myra's presence in the cottage as a justification of a suspicion she knew to be false? He cursed himself for his vile suspicions But she had gone to the beach —if not for that, then for what?

The thought of Fall then entered his mind and took his whole attention, and he glanced hastily, searchingly across the court to see whether he was in his office If this frightful thing were true— His lips met in a long, hard seam as he unlocked the bottom drawer of his desk and without looking hastily withdrew something and slipped it into his pocket He rose, desperate, and leaving his office, crossed to Fall's.

Fall was not there He questioned the porter.

'When will Fall be in?"

"I don't know. Mr. Fall left word he had gone to the beach, but didn't leave no message when he'd be back again'

Ray started, shocked at the advice that Fall had gone to the beach. He said "all right" in a preoccupied voice that seemed even to him not to have emanated from his own throat, and walked unsteadily away, "a sorta quiet, wild look," as the porter afterwards told, "on his face." It was all very clear to him now—her subtle trickery under the mask of 'injured innocence'—Fall with his unspeakable reputation—their discovery in a compromising position by Mrs Fall, and the resultant divorce suit—and now both of them together at the beach!

Had the insanity which now possessed him taken a violent form he might have been apprehended and prevented from doing any harm, but it was visible only in his crafty eyes and unnaturally quiet bearing as he jumped into his auto and started for the coast.

Fall had seen the "extra" before Norris, and his wife's drastic action had made him suddenly afraid. His "sipped from every flower" and recked not the cost; but this thing, copied by all the papers throughout the land, might, and very probably would, ruin him.

He took an early train for the beach, where he endeavored to placate his wife and make her withdraw her charge; but she had ceased to think of him as a positive quantity, and was unmoved by his appeals

When Ethel arrived she went straight to her cottage, which she found deserted. Myra and her father had gone to the shore. She drew in her breath sharply as her anxious eyes, after searching the living room for signs of its new occupant, fell on a large, floppy straw hat flung carelessly on a chair. She picked it up and examined it eagerly, her essential feminine blinding her for the moment to its indication, and causing her to wonder what he could see in that; then realizing its significance she dashed it fiercely to the ground and started for the beach. She walked quickly, tirelessly in the soft sand, and was startled when, after a sharp turn round a ledge of rock, she came upon Willard Fall. He was sobered by his wife's refusal to listen to his entreaties, and was as dejected as his trivial nature would allow. He lifted his hat

"Good afternoon, Mrs. Norris Thought you didn't like the seashore"

"Howdyedo, Mr. Fall. Oh, I come down occasionally."

"I've wanted ever since that frightful day, to let you know how sorry I am that you should have been placed in such an unfortunate position."

He said nothing, however, of the divorce suit, thinking she must already know. She wanted to be rid of him—wanted to fly on wildly—wanted to find them—wanted and feared to—feared every step that took her eager, urgent feet further and further along the limitless stretch of beach. He kept on talking, solicitously trying his utmost to assure her of his regret.

Racing, careening madly down the beach came Norris' auto, its flying wheels sending up a swish of sand in their wake. It stopped within a few yards of them, and Norris, a strange, wild expression on his face, jumped out. He had seen them half a mile off, and the sight of them together changed his crafty, quiet look to one of terrible rage Dashing wildly up to where they stood, he thrust the frightful headline under Ethel's eyes, his face twitching in frightful contortions

"Is it true? Is it true? Is it—" he gurgled chokingly.

Ethel's eyes took in the glaring headline, and followed down to the subhead. She started back, gasping, realizing fully that what she had dreaded had come to pass—that he had learned from another source what she had not the courage to tell him—that he had doubted her as she him—that it was all a hideous misunderstanding fed on by gossip—and that the man before her was a raving maniac

Norris Kills Fall and Slimy Scandal Claims Its Victim.

Fall had edged off But Norris, watching her, needed no answer, her startled gasp as she shrank back convicting her utterly.

His hand went deep in his pocket and when he wheeled and raised his arm there was a short sharp flash and Fall dropped in the sand. He rose, and with faltering steps started like a drunken man toward a cliff overlooking the sea Stumbling falling, desperately rising, he made his way up through the rocks to the cliff's top, as Ethel wrestled frantically with the madman before her

He broke loose from her clutching fingers and again raising his arm pointed it toward the cliff's summit where Fall tottered Another shot—a sickening splash—and the softly lapping, halcyon waters of the Pacific closed over the dead body of Willard Fall.

Slimy scandal, born of doubt and misunderstanding, had come into its own.

Loves were ruined, lives were ended Because a woman couldn't hold her tongue the penalty was paid—paid—paid.

Mrs. Baker So Weak—Could Not Do Her Work—Found Relief In Novel Way.

Adrian, Mich. — "I suffered terribly with female weakness and backache and got so weak that I could hardly do my work. When I washed my dishes I had to sit down and when I would sweep the floor I would get so weak that I would have to get a drink every few minutes, and before I did my dusting I would have to lie down. I got so poorly that my folks thought I was going into consumption. One day I found a piece of paper blowing around the yard and I picked it up and read it. It said 'Saved from the Grave,' and told what Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has done for women. I showed it to my husband and he said, 'Why don't you try it?' So I did, and after I had taken two bottles I felt better and I said to my husband, 'I don't need any more,' and he said 'You had better take it a little longer anyway.' So I took it for three months and got well and strong." —Mrs. ALONZO E. BAKER, 9 Tecumseh St., Adrian, Mich.

Wonderful Run Of Overland Car

S. S. Jones, the hustling agent for the Overland car in this district, is still boasting of the wonderful run which he made last week with the two Model 83 cars of the 1916 type which he brought here from the factory at Toledo, O. The entire trip was made by the way of Elyria, Cleveland, Youngstown, O., Arlington, Coraopolis and Pittsburgh, with the driver going out of high gear but twice.

Mr. Jones is confident that no other car selling at anywhere near the price of the 1916 Overland can accomplish a similar feat, and the other members of the party who made the trip are willing to back him up in his statements. Sam is not only a good Overland booster, but a hustling agent and added four more sales to his credit yesterday.

Large Crowd To Attend Races

Several hundred local people will attend the big hill climbing contest at Uniontown tomorrow. The greater majority will leave here early in the morning in automobiles and some record making runs are expected to the Fayette county seat.

The contest is expected to be the greatest event ever held there as both Ralph DePalma and Joe Dawson, two of the greatest speed kings of the country, have entered and both are confident of taking down the greater portion of the $5,000 prize money. Professionals only will compete, and it is expected that there will be at least twenty entries.

Dawson will drive a big Marmon and believes that it will be able to travel up the asphaltic mountainside in three minutes or less. The record is 3 minutes, 46 seconds, made by Jimmy Kerr last year in a Kline Kar.

Frank H. Rosboro is chairman of the committee which is handling the contest, and he has left nothing undone to make the day a success. The committee has taken precautions to prevent any accident such as last year. when one driver was killed. Mr. Rosboro states that there is parking space for 2,000 machines. The contest has been sanctioned by the A. A U. and the F. A. M.

CHAT ON SUFFRAGE WITH AVERAGE MAN

(Third Installment of a Series.)

By FLORENCE GOFF SCHWARZ.

Glad to see you again, Mr. Average Man. So your suffragette friend couldn't furnish proof that her association is not in accord with Socialism, Feminism, trial marriage, community raising of children, etc.?

I told you so. I merely requested that you ask her to satisfy your own mind. Suffragists may prate of doing wonders for children when they get the ballot, but as long as their association indorses principles which are a menace to the home and the Christian civilization the great majority will stand firmly opposed to votes for women. It's a question of ballots or babies; politics or a better and higher grade of motherhood The publicly expressed theories of the suffragists condemn them without further argument. The Chicago Herald of June 8th carries the following statement by Harriet Taylor Upton state president of the Ohio Suffrage Association. "We, in Ohio, are willing to break the ten commandments to get suffrage." Yes, women are desperate in their methods to win the ballot—to win it, not to use it. It's a sort of game with them—(the winning). When won the charm of novelty is gone and voting is a burden This is why woman suffrage is a failure. Ninety per cent of the women are opposed to assuming the burden and how can they accomplish great things with mind, soul and body in perpetual revolt against that which has been forced upon them?

The Chicago Tribune of June 9th states that 160,000 men voted on the poor farm bonds, while but a little over 8000 women voted on this humanitarian measure. The bond issue was killed, which, if passed, would have completed the new city building. Therefore Chicago has six newly elected judges without court rooms.

Don't you worry, Mr. Average Man "You can't fool all the people all the time." Woman suffrage is a feeble issue New York state alone contains 900,000 more people than the total population of the eleven full suffrage states.

Thomas Jefferson sagely said "a democracy ceases to be a democracy when those who make laws cease to be those able to enforce laws."

Suffragists boast of the mother's pension acts in suffrage states, but they never explain that not a cent has been paid under them, because the same voters who passed these laws refused to vote an appropriation to pay the pensions.

Yes, Mr. Average Man, there are all kinds of ideal laws in the suffrage states, it has cost a mint of money to put them there, but they are not worth the paper they were written on, because they are not enforced This country is beginning to sit up and take notice of the neglected homes and children left to their own devices, the palpable lack of efficiency of woman in her own sphere. Thomas Mott Osborne, warden of Sing Sing prison, declares he will vote against woman suffrage in November, because the possession of the ballot by woman makes her less valuable in social work and the home. Frances Folsom Cleveland Preston argues that men are able to look out for the interests of the state, and she's for letting them do it. Dr. Anna Howard Shaw, head of the suffragettes says she wants bass and soprano voices to chord together in one harmonious strain Under woman suffrage soprano voices would soon husk into bass, and in the general discord the fluting notes of childish treble would be silenced Ballots or babies, Mr. Average Man, which is the more precious, the more important?
